the group with his portrayal of Union General William Tecumseh Sherman. Hannah appeared as Miss Tillie Pierce, a 15-year-old resident of Gettysburg. Rachael, 10, demonstrated Civil War era children's games. The family was back in Rising Sun over the weekend appearing as part of a Civil War reenactment.

They got involved in reenacting when the girls were very young after a friend asked the girls to model Civil War attire. The girls became hooked on history and they've remained actively interested.

"When we're not traveling, the girls are doing research online," said Chris. "This is our hobby. We like to leave the cell phones and iPods at home. When we camp everything is period (1860s)," said Chris.

Jim works as a screen printing and is also paints Civil War works. Chris is a digital press operator.

Rachael attends fifth grade at Quarryville Elementary.

"This (attending living history events) is a learning process. I learn so much listening to other (speakers)," said Rachael. She also said that her friends think it's "cool" that she does living history on weekends. "You can always do Facebook and TV when you get back," she said.

Hannah said that doing the history presentations helps her at school. "My teachers think it's great," she said. "I've been doing it so long, sleeping on a cot in a tent."

Jim said that portraying a Union General is very rewarding. "It's something I wanted to do my whole life and the kids opened the door to it. As long as they are into it, we'll keep going," added Jim.

With care, ethanol gas won't hurt small engines

and seals in older two-cycle engines.

The ethanol, or alcohol, can also absorb water in fuel that isn't stored in tightly closed containers. The water will then make the engine run badly.

that can prevent these problems, Gehman said. One is a marine-type stabilizer that can prevent water from being absorbed. Two-cycle engines should be stored with a full tank of stabilized fuel or allowed to run out of fuel before being stored.

burned up motors here ... We do see carb problems and running problems with older engines being run on gas with ethanol," Gehman said. "If a customer pays attention and stops using the equipment when it starts to run badly, the problems are reduced."

Only one outlet remains for ethanol-free gasoline

to carry conventional gas," said Musser's Market manager Wes Stahl. "There is a premium we have to pay for it, but we don't expect our price to go up by more than a penny." Their supplier has told Musser's that the ethanol-free town, and that will add five to six cents more a gallon to the cost. A lot of people like it, but they are cost-conscious."

That was also the problem at Abel Tire, Dick Abel said.

"People would see the additional cost and that was a
